Rethinking Judicial Activism Ideology: the Nigerian Experience of the Extent and Limits of Legislative-Judicial Interactions

Ibrahim Imam
Department of Public Law, Faculty of Law, University of Ilorin, Ilorin, Nigeria, Email omotossh200620@yahoo.com

Abstract
Authoritarian governments are by their very nature unconstitutional. Such government thinks of themselves as above the law, and therefore sees no necessity for separation of powers or representative governance. Constitutional democracy on the other hand, is however based on the notion of people’s sovereignty, which is to be exercised in limited manner by a representative government. Accordingly, judicial activism in this paper is employed to establish the theory of popular participation of courts in the decision making processes through settlement of disputes, interpretation or construction of laws, determination of propriety of legislations, legislative and execution actions within the doctrine of separation of powers for the purpose of enforcement of the limitations in government on constitutional ground. This paper thus examines the concept of judicial activism, its legitimacy and as a mechanism for providing checks and balances in the Nigerian government. The paper demonstrates a game theory of judicial legislative interaction within their function and contends that the notion of judicial supremacy does not hold water because the legislature always has the second chance of invalidating the judgment of courts exercising the legitimate powers. The paper concludes that judicial activism in these countries is a veritable tool in advancing the compliance with the rule of laws on the ground of the Constitution.

Keywords: Judicial activism, separation of powers, checks and balances, democracy

1. Introduction
The power of government and its limitations by the Constitution has been a difficult question in any democracy around the world. The inception of the Nigerian nascent democracy in 1999 has witnessed a rising public expectations in the realm of protection and enforcement of the rights of citizen which seemed to have been eroded during country’s experience of Military rule and guarantee minimum levels of security. The immense powers exercised by governments over their own citizens have arisen almost entirely from the collective aspirations of the citizen at large, aspirations which depend for their fulfillment on government intervention in many areas of our national life, and which no democratic political actors can ignore. The facts however remains that a powerful executive is inherent characteristic of the Nigerian modern democracy. The proper role of the judiciary in constraining the action of the legislature and the executive thus became imperative. Meernik, & Joseph (1997: 447).

Nigeria as a society divided along the line of ethnicity, regionalism, and religious dichotomy most often do experience lot of controversies and appeal of litigation has been particularly strong with citizens’ increasingly viewing judicial intervention as principal opportunity to shape the public sphere. The Nigerian Constitution 1960, 1963, 1979 and 1999 (as amended in 2010) placed the judiciary in this tasking position with a number of provisions that deal with structure, functions and powers of the judiciary. See A. G. (Federation) v Guardian Newspaper (5 Supreme Court 1999: 107) It introduced a unified system in all the states. The Constitution introduced judicial system in hierarchy viz. The Supreme Court of Nigeria, the apex court of the land, the Court of Appeal and the High courts, Shariah Courts’ of Appeal and Federal High Court. Although the Constitution contains specific provisions relating only to the Supreme Court, Court of Appeal and Federal High Courts it leaves the subordinate judiciary to the states. The judiciary plays a vital role as social activist in the Nigerian progressive democratic reality. This growing role and level of judicial intervention depend on the Nigerian legal system where it operates a written Constitution, thus judiciary exercise only a limited power just as the other institutions of the executive and the legislature. However, in Nigeria like many countries operating written Constitution, judiciary has been under attack for assuming a posture of imperialism or supremacy in the scheme of governance. This proposition may not be true in that the powers are ultimately as limited as is that of the executive and the legislature in their several assignments. Ibrahim (2005: 9) However the provision of the Constitution enables the institutions to provide checks and balances on each other if any indulge in excessive, arbitrary or tyrannical use of the power. Against the above backdrop and by virtue of section 6(6) of the Nigerian Constitution the judiciary has come to exercise vast powers of judicial review from which judicial activism metamorphous in respect of the legislative and executive functions. Thus the Nigerian judiciary as represented by courts generally performs one or all of the following functions in constitutional democracies:

i. Interpretation of the Constitution or law;
ii. Upholding the principle of Federalism by enforcing the balance between the Federal and States organs of Government;

99
iii. Protection of fundamental rights of the citizens;
iv. Determining the validity of legislative, quasi-legislative, executive or quasi-judicial actions on issues that touch the Constitution; and
v. Determining the consistency or inconstancy of a legislation to the Constitution by applying and interpreting the laws of the legislature.

These functions give the courts ability to provide citizen with limited access to the majority-led legislature and effective an enabling environment to challenge unpopular and oppressive policies through the litigation as in the case of Like the case of A. G. of Abia State v A. G. of the Federation, (9 Monthly Judgment of Supreme Court 2006). Admittedly courts have come to exist for the protection of and enforcement of citizens’ rights who put their views across with all potency for them to vent their feelings. This paper will argued in favour of judicial activism and the necessary implication of activist court establishing the rule of law, protection of citizen rights, limiting excess in governance and determining the validity of legislation, legislative and executive actions through checks and balances scheme of the Constitution and purposeful interpretation of laws. The paper is limited to the exploration of judicial role within the concept of separation of powers with particular reference to the Supreme Court being the final court of appeal in the hierarchy of courts and whose decision binds all other

2. Historical Development of Judicial Activism in Nigeria

Instructively, the concept of judicial activism has its origin from the English common law imported into the country, Nigeria and more particularly influenced by the United States of American judicial practice which is attached to the very original debate about constitutional interpretation framed in terms of broad versus strict construction or narrowly and or broadly. Significantly the origin of judicial activism is linked to the power of judicial review asserted by the Supreme Court in Marbury v Madison (1 Cranch 5 United States 1803: 137).
Incidently, there is no provision in the United States Constitution where the power of judicial review is contained Ernest (2002). Yet in the United States, scholars have criticised and accused the Supreme Court, its judgments and judges of judicial activism and, to support their submissions, the cases most often cited are Lawrence v Texas, (539 United States 2003: 558), United States v Morrison, (529 United States 2000: 598), Brown v Board of Education of Topeka, (347 United States 1954: 483), Roe v Wade, (410 United States 1973:
113) and United States v Lopex (410 United States 1973: 113) to mention but a few, have often been used as

It is not certain and difficult to trace the origin of judicial activism linkage with the Nigeria judiciary. The judiciary has come to be established as an independent organ of the government in the Nigerian constitutional democracy since enactment of the 1963 Constitution and subsequently under the 1979 and 1999 Constitutions of Nigeria. It is worthy to note that the period after the declaration of the Federal Republic of Nigeria a few instances evidenced that the Supreme Court exhibited certain elements of judicial activism which established the Court linkage to judicial activism. Adegbenro v Akintola, (1 All Nigerian Law Report 1963: 305), Williams v
Majekodunmi, (2 Supreme Court of Nigerian Law Report 1963: 26), Council of University of Ibadan v
Adamolekun, (Nigerian Supreme Court Cases 1967: 210) and Lakanni v Attorney General Western Nigeria (Nigerian Supreme Court Cases 1970: 143) and other decisions vindicating the rights of Nigerians.

The judiciary has since claims the power to nullify on constitutional grounds inclusive of inconsistent acts of the legislature to the Constitution, or check excesses of the executives. Though courts do not doubt the privileges of the legislature or the executive especially in respect of their internal proceedings, yet such proceedings have been brought under the purview of judicial review. This is what the court exhibited in the cases of Inakoju v Adeleke
(2 Monthly Judgment of Supreme Court 2007: 1), Dapianlong v Dariye (8 Monthly Judgment of Supreme Court 2007: 140). Thus the examples of judicial courage and creativity exhibited by the Supreme Court within its constitutional propriety support the argument that the concept of judicial activism had been with and gradually developed through the function of the courts in Nigeria, though the level of courts’ activism differed in different areas like interpreting the Constitution or statute.

3. The meaning and legal basis for judicial activism

Like any catchword judicial activism acquires its real meaning when construed from context this is because definitions of concept are usually products of individual idiosyncrasies and it is often influenced by the individuals’ perception or world view, a combination of various definitions gives a description of the concept (Ibrahim 2011: 1-4). It is instructive to note at the outset that judicial activism is not a monolithic concept rather it can represent a distinct jurisprudential ideas worthy of further investigation Keenan (2004: 1444).

Notwithstanding, scholars have offered diverse definitions of judicial activism. It may be necessary to give the definition of the concept of judicial activism from the two opposing dimensions proffer by scholars:

Judicial Activism is that mechanism for exercising judicial power which seeks fundamental re-codification of power relation among the dominant institutions of state, manned by members of the ruling classes Mohammed Aslam Alias Bhure v India (2 Supreme Court Cases 2003: 576). Similarly, judicial activism is viewed by Peter Russell (1989: 19) as meaning: Judicial activism is the judicial vigour in enforcing constitutional limitations on the other branches of government and their readiness to veto those policies on the branches of government on constitutional grounds. Interestingly, this paper posits that judicial activism can only acquire its real meaning when construed from the context and this depends upon the user's theoretical conception of the role of the courts in democracy. More importantly, the effect is that judicial activism is a conception of the courts' role as transcending the mere application of laws rather, it support the notion the courts cannot ignore the laws enacted by the legislature, however it can expound, develop and even change it within its function Bhagwati (1992: 7& 8). The main justification for this creative role is the necessity for the reconciliation of the rules with the wider objectives of justice Bhagwati (1992) as can be rightly juxtaposed with observation of Oputa JSC thus: “The law will have little relevance if it refuses to address the social issues of the day. Legislators make laws in the abstract but the court deals with the day to day problems of litigants and attempts to use the laws to solve these problems in such way as to produce justice” Oputa (1993: 37).

Instructively, given the federal structure of Nigerian government, Nwabueze (1982: 32-36) judicial activism may be constitutionally invoked to invalidate legislation, legislative or executive actions which are inconsistent with the Constitution Calibers, Steven (1995: 752). When the courts wield their power and strike down legislation their action implicates separation of powers issues because the Court’s decision challenges policy choices made by the other institutions of government. However, such a judicial act carries with it the potential for awakening the legislature and the executive, including the choice of reversal through constitutional amendment or re-enactment of the invalidated legislation Hart (1980: 23). This is a beguilingly simple model of the relationship between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary in a representative democracy with responsible government.

Judicial activism adopting liberal or purposeful approach often professes belief in democratic principles of checks and balances Jeffrey (1997: 28), aimed at producing substantive results that may achieve the intent of the legislature or framer of the statute and Constitution Bradley (1980: 236) and Jesse (1980). Interestingly, the Court’s liberally-oriented activism has led conservatives not eschew activist judicial review when it is, at least theoretically, more consistent with the concept of limited government favored by many conservatives.

Interventionist in the form of a Supreme Court exercise of its power may be viewed as a solution to the problem of how best to enforce rule of law, protect fundamental rights and interests in an oligarchy government. Obviously, then, to make a reasonable decision about the legal disputes require not only an empirical assessment of the probable consequences of alternative processes in the concrete setting of a particular country, but also a judgment about the relative weight to assign to the democratic process in comparison with other values Robert (1989: 192).

However, the concept of judicial activism has been subjected to criticism by it opponents on the claim that it allowed court to usurp the power of other institutions of government therefore, undemocratic. The best answer to such criticism can be found in the word of Hon Justice Michael Kirby, who posited that: Nostalgic dreams of judges without choices, devoid of creativity, abjuring all ‘activism’ may be found in fairy stories. But for judges, lawyers and citizens who are obliged to live in the real world, it is necessary to face up to the requirements of judicial choice. Choice about the meaning of a constitutional text, choice about the interpretation of ambiguous legislation, choice about the application, extension, confinement or elaboration of old principles of the common law to new facts, circumstances and times Michael Kirby (2006: 577-8). Insightfully however, judicial activism is closely connected to the dynamic, creative and objective reading of constitutional text by the court (Ibrahim 2011: 4). In other words, a constitutional interpretation which requires continual updating of the Constitution in line with the perceived community and social expectations posits to achieve the object of the Constitution intended to endure for age long; as rightly observed by Lord Wright in the Australian case of James v. Commonwealth of Australia (Appeal Case 1936: 614) that:

It is true that a Constitution must not be construed in any narrow and pedantic sense. The words used are necessarily general, and their full import and true meaning can often only be appreciated when considered, as the years go on, in relation to the vicissitudes of fact which from time to time emerge. It is not that the meaning of the words changes, but the changing circumstances illustrates and illuminates the full import of that meaning.

4. Judicial-Legislative interaction enforcing constitutional limitations on legislative actions

This part of the paper begins with a discussion on the judicial, legislative and executive interactive principles of activism that animate the preposition of judicial activism. The part then analysed some judgments to elucidate the realities concerning the concept of judicial activism. The theory of “institutional interaction,” as conceptualized in this paper, may be view as a Nigerian perspectives to the debate over the legitimacy of judicial activism in a constitutional and developing democracy. According to this theoretical exposition, the institution of courts and the legislatures participate in government and with inherent level of interaction in the determination of the proper balanced role the Constitution designed for each institution and enforcing or limiting the balance on Constitutional ground on each Goodrich & Valverde (2005).
There is strong rationale to view judicial activism as democratically legitimate in that it provides checks and balances as expected under the doctrine of separation of powers. Importantly, this interaction is continuous on the ground that the judiciary does not necessarily have the last word with respect to constitutionally disputed matters and policies in that the legislatures would almost always have the power to re-enact, reverse, modify, ignore or void a judicial decision nullifying legislation. Consequently the cry of judicial supremacy is objectionable in presence legislative supremacy the sustaining judicial activism within the paradigm of separation of power. The theory of institutional interaction has emerged theoretically out of the Nigerian experience of constitutionalism and is based on Constitution. The theory of institutional interaction it is claimed, has been made possible by virtue of constitutional provisions, the most important of which are the section 1(3) "Supremacy clause ‘that override any legislation, legislative or executive action that is inconsistent with the Constitution. According to section 4(8) of the Constitution, legislative actions are subject of judicial intervention and the Constitution also forbids the legislature from enacting laws to oust the jurisdiction of the courts. This theory of institutional interaction describes a peculiar feature of the Nigerian constitutional arrangement.

5. Judicial-Legislative interaction vide interpretation of legislation

While it is the power of the legislature to enact law, the interpretation of the law and legislative action stemming there from is vested in the judiciary as represented by the courts MacLean (1990: 161). Essentially, aside from the Constitutional power of judicial interpretation there are certain predictive factors that can stimulate interpretation. It is instructively posited that the words used in legal instruments may sometimes be abstract, or that their meaning indeterminate when applied to various concrete circumstances, or that the application of law requires an intervening act of interpretation, of which the precise nature and significance is largely undefined and contested FRN v Osahon (4 Monthly Judgment of Supreme Court 2006: 58). The consequence of such an (apparently obvious) axiom is that while a distinction necessarily exists between the application of law and its creation, it is often claimed that interpretation, in applying words of often indefinite meaning to various situations, may amount to a creative act and consequently a criticism that judges in interpreting law, in fact participate in its creation Marmo (1994: 124). It has been an accepted canon in interpretation of document to interpolate into the text such provisions not though expressed as essential to prevent the defeat of their purpose and this applies with special force to the interpretation of Constitution which, since they are designed to cover a great multitude of necessarily unforeseen circumstances, are cast in general language which are not constantly amended”. Though the problem inherent in judicial exercise of interpretative power is stated by MacLean that: … the process of interpretation is not a humble one… rather than being the servants of the text, interpreters threaten to become its masters by devising and applying the rules by which sense is made of it; indeed, they threaten to become its masters to the point of laying down the law themselves MacLean 1990: 161).

There are rules of legal methodologies for interpretation such as the Literal Rule, the Golden Rule,’ the ‘Mischief Rule,’ Ejusdem Generia, Blue Pencil, Severability principle, these are mere semantic aids rather than linguistic devices for reading the text of the Constitution or Statutes. The absence of recognised, single and all encompassing binding methods of interpretation, and the resulting potential for lack of precision is particularly problematic as rightly observed in the case of Awolowo v Shehu Shagari (6-7 Supreme Court 1979: 64) per Fatai Williams said that: Some of these canons of interpretation take the form of broad principle only; consequently a common feature of most of them is that they are of little practical assistance in settling doubts about interpretation in particular cases. This is partly due to vagueness, but also because in many cases, where one canon appears to support a particular interpretation, there is another canon, often on equal status, which can be invoke in favour of an interpretation, which could lead to a different result.

The above court proposition established the fact that some cannons of interpretation take the form outlined, especially in the cases of constitutional law. These common principles of statutory interpretation have been considered unsuitable for interpretation of constitutional provisions, which in the nature of things tend to lay down general principles. Onu JSC in DSSS v Abgakoba (3 Supreme Court, 1999: 82) observes that: “It is important to state that the Constitution cannot condescend in its description of every right guaranteed therein. The Constitution is an organic document which must be treated as speaking from time to time, it can only described rights it guarantees in broad terms, it is for the court to fill the fundamental right provisions with content such that would fulfill its purpose and infused them with life. A narrow and literal construction of human right or any provision in our Constitution can only make the Constitution arid in the sphere of rights. Such approach will retard the realization, enjoyment and protection of those citizen’s rights and freedom and it is unacceptable”. It is contended in this paper therefore that words of Constitution or legislation may sometimes have a penumbra of uncertainty thus marginal cases are bound to occur especially from the scenarios above enumerated. Therefore, if marginal cases must occur the duty of a judge in construing them must be legislative Bas De Gaay (2006: 22). More importantly the spirit of the constitution or statute is a fact unlikely to be encapsulated in the single word and even the whole text of the laws. It can rather be apprehended through adaptation of the text to diverse circumstances imposed with the passage of time. This is because constitution or statute is meant to endure for ages to come and to meet the various cases of human affairs. In its decision the Supreme Court in the case of Nafiu Rabiu v The State (2 Nigerian Criminal Law Report 1981: 326) per Udo Udoma JSC said, “where the question is whether the Constitution has used an expression in a wider or narrow sense the court should always lean where the justice of the case so demands to the broader interpretation unless there is something in the context or in the rest of the Constitution to indicate that the narrow interpretation will best carry out its object and purpose”.

Thus, rather than relying on predetermined meaning, the spirit of the laws admits shift of meaning. This is the kind of challenges court is expected to meet. It is also a challenge the contemporary constitutional or statutory text are suited for due to their relatively indeterminate language. Obaseki JSC in Attorney General Bendel State v Attorney General of the Federation (10 Supreme Court 1981: 1790180) said: “While language of the Constitution does not change, the changing circumstances of progressive society for which it was designed can yield a new and further import to its meaning. Thus, principles upon which the Constitution is designed rather than the direct operation or literal meaning of the words used should measure the purpose and scope of its provisions”. Juxtapose this preposition with the case of PDP v INEC (10 Supreme Court 1999: 30) where court was faced with the interpretation of the word die in section 37 and 45 of (Constitution and Transition) Decree 1999, to remedy the development which the Decree failed to provide and which is inevitably placed before the court to determine. The Court in exercising its interpretative power, inferred from the text of the Constitution in line with the development by construing the word die to admit further meanings which may be; stop living, stop working or stop existing within a rule as to death. Thus A judge has no discretion to include resignation, mental incapacity within such a rule.

One significant conclusion that can be drawn from the foregoing preposition on the penumbra nature of the words of Constitution or legislation is to accentuates the need for a judge to pay due regard to legislative intent without limiting the task of interpretation to the ascertainment of that purpose. The following is a very important illustration, closely related to the capacity of judges to intelligently articulate their positions in terms of plausible constitutional interpretation. How, for example, could a rabble in Muslims’ Boko Haram, based in the cities of Northern Nigeria, possibly be authorised to call onto the heads of all the Christian and other religious followers in the Country for all future time a blood curse such as would justify their demand for Islamisation of the Country? How, in the context of a religion dedicated to the message of the love of God, and of one another, could such a passage possibly be so interpreted? How, other than by the most mindless literalism, could anyone construe any verse of such meaning, as Muslims Boko Haram did, to justify their demand for Shariah in Nigeria and the dreadful acts of bombing and killing perpetrated against innocent citizens?

It is the author of this paper’s belief, a good illustration of the dangers of literalism. This is such a debased and discredited approach to the interpretation of language (whether in the Quran, Bible or in a constitution or legislation) that it hardly seems necessary to elaborate why it is so misguided. Yet the literalists and the textualists are now in full flight. They want judges to stick as closely as possible to the text of the statute and even, mirabile dictum (expression of wonder), to the original intention of the framers of the Constitution Michael Kirby (2006: 584).

6. Judicial-Legislative interaction vide legislative action

In this realm, this paper develops a theoretical model of judicial and legislative interaction a contemplation of the doctrine of checks and balances. It uses this to compare outcomes generated in a system of legislative supremacy to outcomes generated in a system in which judicial activism is provided by a legally principled and constitutional activist judiciary Rogers & Vanberg (2010: 443). The paper then shows that judicial activism, even when exhibited by an activist, or politicized, can promote important constitutional values and improve legislative quality relative. From the outset it is instructive to note that judicial activism of the court cannot be used to query the legislative power to enact laws that is not within the prerogative of the judiciary. The Courts are most often reluctant to rule in favour of invalidation of legislation.

However, the Courts as the custodian of the Constitution may have a willing ability to invalidate legislation in the face of its aberration. In support of this preposition it is contended that legislative action must always be based on the Constitution, thus is posited that in any of the following theoretical prepositions where the legislature fails thereon judicial activism is invited on constitutional ground. They are:

1. When legislation offends the principle of separation of power or the principle of federalism;
2. When legislation is inconsistent with the provision of the Constitution;
3. When legislation is aimed at taking away individual rights guaranteed under the Constitution; and
4. When the legislature failed to comply with the procedure set down to doing a particular act.

Within the above framework, it is neither judicial institution trespasses on the role of the legislature. Legislature respects the judicial power in order to avoid interfering with the role of the courts. The courts respect legislative propriety to make, amend, repeal, re-enact laws and do not become involved with the internal workings of the legislature. Instructively Lord Woolf (1995) quoted by France (2012: 5-6) was prepared to define a limit on the supremacy of parliament which it would be the responsibility of the courts to identify and uphold. He explicitly said: “As a matter of fundamental principle, it is my opinion that the survival and flourishing of a democracy in which basic rights (of which freedom of expression may be taken as a paradigm) are not only respected but enshrined requires that those who exercise democratic, political power must have limits set to what they may do: limits which they are not allowed to overstep. If this is right, it is a function of democratic power itself that it be not absolute”.

A famous example of such intrusion is demonstrated in the case of Oputa v Babangida, (1 Supreme Court 2003: 86) the Supreme Court courageously held that: The power given to Parliament to make laws in regard to tribunal of inquiry as reflected in the legislative Lists contained in the relevant provisions of the schedule to the 1963 constitution was, for whatever reasons, denied the National Assembly in both that 1979 and 1999 Constitutions of the federal Republic of Nigeria. Another case which seemed to favour some such intrusion include for instance the Attorney General Ogun State & Ors v Attorney General of the Federation (12 Supreme Court of Nigeria Judgment 2002: 1) the Supreme Court held that the Act enacted by the National Assembly establishing a Joint Local Government Account Allocation Committees for each State to regulate how the amount allocated to the States for the benefit of the Local Governments is to be distributed, such Act is inconsistent with Section 162 (8) of the 1999 Constitution. Similarly in Attorney General Ondo State v. Attorney General of the Federation & Others, (Supreme Court of Nigeria Law Report 1983: 269) the Supreme Court held that the provisions of the Act (ICPC) impugned on the cardinal principles of federalism, namely, the requirement of equality and autonomy of the State Government and non-interference with functions of State Government. So also is the case of Attorney General Abia State & Ors v Attorney General of the Federation (4 Supreme Court of Nigeria Judgment 2002: 1) this Court held that apart from the power conferred in item II of the Concurrent Legislative List and Section 7 (6) (a) of the 1999 Constitution, (Power to make provision for statutory allocation of public revenue to Local Government Councils in the Federation) the National Assembly does not possess any other power to enact laws affecting local government.

The proposition of legislative-judicial interaction in this perspectives is not peculiar to Nigeria as in the Indian case of Golaknath v Punjab (AIR Supreme Court 1967: 1643) for instance the Supreme Court ruled that Parliament could not curtail any of the fundamental rights in the Constitution. This case initiated and developed the court’s jurisprudence around what became known as the “basic structure doctrine”. In terms of this doctrine, the court was in charge of preventing the erosion of those enduring values that constitute the essence of constitutionalism Sathe (2002: 99). Similarly, in Kesavananda Bharati v State of Kerala (4 Supreme Court 1973: 225) by a majority of 7-6, the court held that under Article 368 of the Constitution, Parliament undoubtedly had power to amend any provision of the Constitution but the amendatory power did not extend to alter the basic structure or framework of the Constitution. This decision is a typical manifestation of creativity in the form of judicial activism Divan (2007).

Notwithstanding the judicial position in the above cases, it is apposite to state that the legislature is not accountable to the courts in respect of their legislative functions. However, the legislature is accountable for creating an inroad to judicial intervention in determination of the legality and or consistency of such functions. While deciding the above cases, the court kept in mind the difference between legality, consistency and merit as also between judicial propriety and merit of its intervention. It may thus be argued that legislature invited judicial activism for their preferences as democrat ically elected members of government. There is therefore significant force in the observation of Venderbit (2006) cited in Uwais (2006: 8) that: “it is in the courts and not the legislature that our citizens are primarily fallen keen, cutting edge of the law. If they have respect for the work of the courts, their respect for the law will survive the shortcomings of every other branch of government. However if they lose their respect for the work of the courts, their respect for law and order will vanish with it to the detriment of the society”.

Instructively therefore, it is more appropriate for courts to intervene against legislative aberration of the constitution at least when reviewing ordinarily their action or legislation. Such judicial activism represents a warranted intrusion of the judiciary into democratic decision making. See Adetokunbo (2008: 18), Awotokun, (1998: 4) & Uwafio (1995: 152). This paper thus contends that judicial activism of the courts’ invalidation of legislation is justified and capable of achieving and stimulating the followings:

i. Eliminate imperfections arising from hasty drafting of statutes or absurdities that could only be manifested in concrete situations.

ii. Expose the lacuna in a legislation and give direction to assist amendment

iii. Suppress the mischief which the law aimed at and advance remedy

iv. Serves a purpose of awakening the legislature conscience to make amend

v. Provide generally-applicable rules for future; it is done, so that their orders may resemble legislation to some onlooker.

vi. Inspire the legislature to re-enact an invalidated legislation.

Thus where there is constitutional provision setting out the procedure for any legislative action any default in the procedure in exercise of legislative power is actionable and liable to judicial scrutiny Alabi (2010: 284). The justification for judicial activism within this premises is that if in the process of exercising legislative power by the National or states’ Assembly there is such a constitutional defect as to lead to an interpretation to the effect that a bill was not passed according to law, that is, it does not follow the procedure laid down under the constitution of passing of the bill, then the bill which has passed through such exercise is null and what the President assents to, an exercise of the executive power within the legislative process is a nullity, the Supreme Court in exercise of its jurisdiction under section 212 when there is a dispute under the section could adjudicate on the issue. Conclusively, the limitations on legislative authority and affirmative action guaranteeing liberty can be preserved in practice no other way than through the medium of the courts of justice whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenure of Constitution void without this, all reservations of the particular rights or privileges would amount to nothing. Thus, the notion of judicial supremacy cannot be real since the courts do not have the last say in view of the legislative power to amend, re-enact or ignore an invalidated legislation.

7. Conclusion
It is the conclusion of this paper that judicial activism is a noble concept for attaining justice and achieving democratic development and well entrenched in doctrine of separation of powers. Therefore, it is expedient to note that in exercising interpretative role or disputes settlement courts must employ modes of interpretation that are consistent with an activist approach to avoid absurdity or perpetration of injustice which is not intended by the Constitution. These models include the broad, liberal approach and the contextual, purposive approach. It is only those modes of interpretation that take into account the purposes or objects of the Constitution; the context and the overarching principles on which the Constitution was founded; as well as the values underlying the inclusion of a particular right in the Constitution that are truly consistent with an activist nature of interpreting the Constitution.

Judiciary is primarily a legal institution that exercises power of both constitutional and statutory interpretation while establishing precedents intended to direct the decisions of all lower courts. Notwithstanding, the Court is also a political institution that is situated in a complex separation of powers providing checks and balances with justices who are members of the society and hold their own political values and ideology Re-Olafisoye, (2011) Perspectives of the Legislature in the Government of Nigeria, (2010) African Training Research Centre in Administration for Development (CAFRAD)

References
Bhagwati P. N., (1992) 2(3) The Role of Judiciary in Democratic Process: Balancing Activism and restraint. JHLR
Ibrahim I., (2005) 4(1); the Executive, Legislative and Judiciary: An Insight into their functions under the Nigerian Democratic Setting, Journal for the Promotion of Studies in Religion, Education and Languages (JOPSERL) Meernik, James, & Joseph (1997) 41, Ignagni, Judicial Review and Coordinate Construction of the Constitution, American J. of Political Sathe, S. P., (2002), Judicial Activism in India: Transgressing Borders and Enforcing Limits, New Dehli, OUP