A Study of the Multi Dimensional function of the Image of the Pear Tree in Mansfield's Short Story Bliss

Professor Dr. Ekbal Al-Jabbar
Zarqa University, Faculty of Arts
Department of English Language and Literature

1- Introduction:
Kathleen Mansfield (1888 –1923) is one of the outstanding twentieth century short story writers and a poetess whose poems reveal her overwhelming interest in using nature imagery to enhance the social, moral and psychological ideas in her work. Kathleen Mansfield was born and brought up in New Zealand. She left for Great Britain in 1908, where she encountered modernist writers such as D.H. Lawrence and Virginia Woolf and eventually, they became close friends. Mansfield read the works of Marcel Proust, Wordsworth, Coleridge, T.S. Eliot, Oscar Wilde and other English writers of the early twentieth century. Her stories often focus on moments of crisis which cover a short period of time, approximately a day, in which the central character passes from a stage of innocence to personal and social awareness.

Mrs. Dalloway (1925) is a novel by Virginia Woolf which details a day in the life of the heroine, Clarissa Dalloway who prepares for a party to be held in the evening. Katherine Mansfield’s short story Bliss (first published in The English Review in 1920 and later in the collection Bliss and Other Stories, 1922) also describes a day in the heroine, Bertha Young’s life. Like Clarissa Dalloway, Bertha Young is preparing for a grand dinner party in the evening in her own house. Unlike Mrs. Dalloway who seems miserable and totally discontented with her family and her married life to her husband Richard, we first meet Bertha Young in a state of rapture, reflecting her transient happiness and contentment with everything around her. The experiences of the party for the latter climaxes into a great disappointment and resignation as she realizes her husband's deception and her own naive perception of the true meaning of the bliss in her life.

However, at the end of her party, Mrs. Dalloway realizes that all her miseries and negative feelings are mere self delusions related to the neuroses of the middle age. She discovers that the true meaning of happiness and fulfillment in her life resides in being close to her family ties and responsibilities as a wife and a mother. The experiences of the party result in similar crucial awakening in the life of Bertha Young, but in a totally opposite direction: The status of bliss and anxiety she has been experiencing at the start of the party changes into utter misery coupled with her painful recognition of being patronized by her domineering and selfish husband. Her perception of her true female position reinforces a new understanding of the meaning of bliss in her life. She realizes that complete happiness or rapture is either non-existent or superficially achieved within the social reality of male domination and female role playing.

As a modern writer, Katherine Mansfield adopts different means, such as magic realism, symbolism, psychoanalysis, Marxism and feminist theories in delineating her female protagonist's predicament and her ultimate transformation. She also employs poetic and dramatic techniques for the same purposes in the story. This paper attempts to focus especially on Mansfield's three dimensional use of the pear tree in foreshadowing the heroine's odyssey towards self-reckoning, which is innovative in essence. Above all, Mansfield uses the pear tree as a symbol that constantly shifts in meaning and significance in the course of the narrative. In the early parts of the story the image of the pear tree symbolizes the heroine's naivety and blindness to reality. Yet, throughout the story the image of the pear tree becomes a motif associated with the heroine's manner of perception of her state of being in bliss. From this perspective, it submerges into a sublime means for creating harmony, unity and coherence between the essential events of the one day in the heroine's life. At the end of Mansfield's narrative the peer tree submerges into a sublime element of epiphany which engenders in Bertha's final self-recognition.

This paper will be divided into four sections. The first section is an introduction which states the main ideas of the study. Section two focuses on the central character, Bertha Young's tendency to self delusion. Section three provide a through analyses of the role of the peer in Bertha's journey towards traumatic self realization. Section four highlights the main findings of the paper.

2- Bertha’s Romantic Perception of Reality:
The first part of Katherine Mansfield's short story Bliss stages the protagonist Bertha Young inhabiting a world of magic realism, a paradise on earth and a colorful version of the reality in which she is overwhelmed by overflowing feeling of happiness that words are not sufficient enough for her to describe.
What can you do if you are thirty and, turning the corner of your own street, you are overcome, suddenly by a feeling of bliss—absolute bliss—as though you'd suddenly swallowed a bright piece of that late afternoon sun and it burned your bosom, sending out a little shower of sparks into every practice, into every finger and toe?...that all her feeling of bliss came back again, and again she didn't know how to express it -- what to do with it (137).

It is important to note that Bertha's present situation can not be regarded as living in a world of pure fantasy or illusion, because she is not escaping reality to day dreams. This reality is too perfect for her, and her personal satisfaction and insurmountable happiness in her married life to Harold are not in question. In her seminal study Fantasy: The Literature of Subversion, Rosemary Jackson argues that fantasy refers to that "which is visionary, unreal … and it is linked with the individuals' existential anxiety and unease in real world“ (52). Bertha's world can neither be composed in a fairy tale tradition, for she does not totally cut herself off from reality. She seems to plant her temporal or mundane world with magical dream elements to blend her inner feeling of the magic of complete happiness with her outer world. She imagines that she has everything she hopes for in her married life; namely a wealthy husband, a lovely daughter, a nurse and a servant as serving commodities, in addition to having sophisticated friends and a beautiful garden to be proud of:

Really--really--she had everything. She was young. Harry and she were as much in love as ever, and they got on together splendidly and were really good pals. She had an adorable baby. They didn't have to worry about money. They had this absolute satisfactory house and garden. And friends—modern thrilling friends....And there were books, and there were music... (My italics, 146).

Bertha's supreme blending between the outer reality and her inner feelings into a melting pot of magic also helps her to create an alternative version of reality which will assist her to encompass her experience of being "perfectly" and "divinely" in a state of bliss "like the " slender pear tree in fullest, richest bloom " in her garden(145). At this point in the narrative the image of the pear tree stands as a symbol of Bertha herself and her pride in her apparently superior achievements as a women in the Victorian society. The pear tree also epitomizes her inner happiness and exultation since she can not articulate them through linguistic expressions. (Gregor, 75) This unconscious motivation for inventing a substitute reality for herself is captured in her insistence to "bring the carpet up to the table". Undoubtedly, the table here is a symbol of reality which she wants to co-coordinate with the magic carpet of Sindibad from One Thousand and One Nights. Bertha's failure to articulate the limit of her inward feeling of joy which seems to be reminiscent of Gudrun's state of "still happiness" in D.H. Lawrence's grown jewel work Women in Love (Martin, 96) are depicted in her own wondering: "Oh, is there no way you can express it without being 'drunk' and disorderly?" How idiotic civilization is! Why be Given a body if you have to keep it shut up in a case like a rare, rare fiddle?" (138). The heroine's reference here to the "rare fiddle" is crucial. In this particular instance, it highlights the central notion of the complexity lies in expressing for herself and the readers this rare and extraordinary moment of exultation and transient happiness she is actually embracing on the very day she is preparing to have a grand party in her house.

However, the technique of mixing the fantastic and the real in the delineation of the heroine in this part of the story is of great importance: It does not only confirm Mansfield's status within modern writing, but also places Bertha's potentiality within childhood perspective of naivety and innocence. As stated by Jackson "children have a different conception of 'self', and blend their inner life with reality more freely than adults, who are conversely more alert to the objectivity of facts and the potential distortions deriving from perceptions and references" (P.45). From the start of the story we are made aware of the despairing fact that although Bertha is at the prime age of thirty, yet she has not crossed the boundaries of her childhood to reach maturity as adult. Mansfield's initial introduction of her character shows her trying to express her benumbing sense of elation in a manner similar to that of a child when given a precious gift or playing with other children in a playground and feeling innocently happy:

ALTHOUGH Bertha Young was thirty she still had moments when she wanted to run instead of walk, to take dancing steps on and off the pavements, to bowl a hoop, to throw something up in the air and catch it again, or to stand still and laugh at—nothing—at nothing, simply (137).

The apparent discrepancy in Bertha's character is ironically illustrated in the capitalization of the word "ALTHOUGH" in the first line of the story. Thus, when Nanny tells her that little B clutched the ear of a dog, when she took her to the park, Bertha stands paralyzed as a helpless child unable to show any mature response to the situation: "Bertha wanted to ask if it wasn't rather dangerous to let her clutch at strange dog's ear. But she did not dare to. She stood watching them, her hands by her side, like the poor little girl in front of the rich girl with the doll" (141).

In the above quotation, the heroine's allusion to her resemblance to our Else, one of the major characters in Katherine Mansfield's short story The Doll's House is of great significance. As the little poor girl whom Aunt Beryl "shooed out" with her sister from the house "as if they were chickens" and prevented them from seeing the doll's house, Bertha appears utterly incapable of facing the challenges of her adult reality. Bertha's Our Else-like image of helplessness is magnified theatrically in her description standing still with her"hands by her side" like an obedient but a confused and helpless child in the above quotation. In practical terms, her child-like excitation and playfulness are remarkably drawn in the manner she arranges the fruit bowl on the table in her dining room and later in the spontaneity with which she disposes the cushions one by one on the couches in her drawing room (141-145).

As she enters her dining room, which for her becomes the initial stage upon which she is going to enact her limitless happiness with her husband Harold, whom she blindly believes the main cause of being in bliss, she states that"in her bosom there was still that bright glowing place—that shower of little sparks coming from it" (137). In a manner echoing the romantic poetess Christina Rossetti in her poem "A Birthday" (1830-1894), Bertha arranges the fruit bowl on a tray and with it a glowing bowl, and a blue dish brought by her maid in a way to show that the evening party is a private celebration for her beloved Harold has come to her. Rossetti's poem describes her preparation for a party in which she uses sparking colors to express her love and gratitude for a man whom she considers the day of her meeting with him as her actual birthday:

> Raise me a daïs of silk and down;
> Hang it with vair and purple dyes;
> Carve it in doves and pomegranates,
> Work it in gold and silver grapes,
> In leaves and silver fleurs-de-lys;
> Because the birthday of my life
> Is come, my love is come to me.

Likewise, Bertha, in her decoration and arrangement of the fruits on the dining table, focuses on the matching of bright silver, red and gold colors to enhance the image of her complete happiness and contentment in her married life to Harold:

There were tangerines and apples stained with strawberry pink. Some yellow pears, smooth as silk, some white grapes covered with a silver bloom and a big cluster of purple ones. These ast she had brought to tone in with the new dining—room carpet, Yes, that did sound rather far—fetched and abused, but it was really why she had brought them. She had thought in the shop "I must have some purple ones to bring the carpet up to the table"...When had finished with them and had, with them and had mad two pyramids of these bright round shapes, she stood away from the table to get the effect.... This, of course, in her present mood, was incredibly beautiful....She began to laugh, "No, no I'm getting hysterical (139).
Within these imaginary and romantic approaches to reality, the two bright pyramids, in the above quotation, refer to herself and her husband Harold reaching the peak of insurmountable state of happiness together. The irony is that the pyramids, from the perspective of Mansfield’s feminist ideology in the work, refer to the male authority which Bertha is unknowingly celebrating. When Harold phones to tell her that he will be ten minutes late for the party, she naively ponders: “What had she to say? She'd nothing to say. She only wanted to get in touch with him for a moment. She couldn’t absurdly cry. Hasn't it been a divine day!” (143).

Bertha’s shrouding everything related to herself and her life with illusory and romantic divinity crystallizes her utter obliviousness of the reality of Harold’s deceptive nature. Bertha’s tendency to illusions is highlighted further in her refusal to see her reflection in the mirror. We are told that while waiting for Mary in the dinning room, she “hardly dared to look into the cold mirror “ (139). When she dares to have a glimpse of herself: “It gave her back a woman, radiant, with smiling, trembling lips, with big dark eyes and an air of listening, waiting for something...divine to happen...that she knew must happen...infallibly ”. (Ibid ). There is no doubt that this exaggerated mirror image is that of a romantic dreamer than Bertha's real self. For the very reason, she insists that maid should not turn the light in the room. With an unprecedented self-confidence, she informs her: "No, thank you. I can see quite well " (ibid ). The image of the darkness in the very room she is going to celebrate her love for Harry is an emblem of the darkness within herself which stands as a clear obstacle in the way of her attaining any responsible conduct in her life. Mansfield reiterates the shortcoming of Berth's character, once more, in the latter’s skeptical attitude to her little daughter B in the nursery. Bertha contemplates: "that all her feeling of bliss came back again, and again she didn't know how to express it -- what to do with it “ (142). With Bertha's final declaration the curtain falls to announce the end of the first act to pave the way for the second and most crucial act prior to her gaining full self-realization in the party.

Mansfield’s description of her heroine in the this part of story focuses further on her inclination to romanticism and emotional response to her environment. She also draws attention to her paramount concern for her appearance in the party. As a romantic figure in a painting by the romantic poet and painter Gabriel Rossetti, Bertha plans to wear a "white dress, a string of jade beads, green shoes and stockings" (146). She desires to coordinate her angelic hostess image within the inventive romantic atmosphere of her drawing-room which is going to be the first stage for celebrating her love and happiness with Harold in the party:

She went into the drawing-room and lighted the fire; then, picking up the cushions, one by one, hat Mary had disposed so carefully, she threw them back on to the chairs and the couches. That made all the difference; the room came alive at once. As she was about to throw the last one she surprised herself by suddenly hugging it to her passionately, passionately. But it did not put out the fire in her bosom. Oh, on the contrary!

The window of the drawing-room opened on to a balcony overlooking the garden. At the far end, against the wall, there was a tall, slender pear tree in fullest, richest bloom; it stood perfect, as though becalmed against the jade-green sky. Bertha couldn't help feeling, even from this distance, that it has not a single bud or a faded petal. Down below, in the garden beds, the red and grey tulips, heavy with flowers, seemed to lean upon the dusk. A grey cat, dragging its belly, crept across the lawn, and a black one, its shadow, trailed after the sight of them, so intent and so quick, gave Bertha a curious shiver. (144-145, My italics)

The above passages are illuminating examples of Mansfield's creative talent in placing Bertha's dilemma within the romantic tradition of using nature imagery to mirror her agonies in reality. This shift in the author's technique is in a parallel line with the shift in the delineation of the heroine's female crises in a new light. It is worthwhile to start with the mention first of the cats in the above quotation which not coincidental. In reality cats are known to be deceptive animals by nature. At the same time they are symbol of warmth and coziness. Thus, while the black colored cat symbolizes at this stage in the course of the development of the her unrealistic and naive formulation of the warmth engendered by her ardent feeling of bliss with Harry.
Inevitably, the image of the cat recalls in the reader’s mind the short story Cat in the Rain (1899-1961) by the American author Ernest Hemingway. Hemingway illustrates in the story how a nameless American wife feels starved for attention and love in her marriage to a dominating husband, who insists to have her hair cut too short like boys. He uses the cat as a symbol of the warmth of fulfillment she inspires to achieve in her relation with her husband.

Unlike the heroine of the story Cat in the Rain, Mansfield's character creates, in her magical realistic world, an illusory version of her perfect happiness and fulfillment with her husband Harold, symbolized, as mentioned earlier, in her reference to the grey cat. like Kezia in Mansfield's short story "The Doll's House", who adapts herself to social conformity, Bertha is trained from an early stage in her life to adjust to the reality of being patronized by the male members of her society in return for a luxurious and irresponsible way of living. This is perhaps the reason why she has never contemplated the nature of her relationship with Harold, nor consciously acknowledged the existing unbridgeable gap between herself and her promiscuous husband. According, the pear tree depicted in the above mention passage symbolizes Bertha's blindness to the reality of Harold and her authoritarian male dominated society. We are told that, Bertha couldn't help feeling, even from this distance that it had not had not a single bud or a faded petal " (P.141). Her understanding the true significance of the pear in her garden of life is still superficial. She still conceives it a sign of her ecstasy in her life.

However, the disparity between Bertha and Harold is genuinely illustrated in their conversation about their guest, Miss Fulton. When Bertha declares that "Miss Fulton was rarely, wonderfully frank" (144), we are told that Harold seems reluctant to agree with his wife's point of view about Miss Fulton: " Harold said "No ". Voted her dullish and "cold like all blond women with touch, perhaps, of anaemia of all brain " . But Bertha wouldn't agree with him; not yet (144). This argument between Bertha and Harold on the surface appears trivial and almost insignificant. In reality it sheds light on Harold's deceptive character. His provocative description of Miss Fulton, in the above quotation "as" good stomach " and "anaemia of all brain " is no more than a cover up for the reality of sharing a secret affair with her. Bertha naively conceived his words as indications of his male intelligence and superiority. In formulating this image of him, she is actually justifying for herself her blind reliance on him as her savior. Her vain and superfluous image of Harold conveyed in a mental soliloquy, parading him as a chivalric hero in a romantic fiction:

> Harry had such a zest for life. Oh, how she appreciated it in him.
> And his passion for fighting --for seeking in every that came up > Against another test of his power and courage—that, too she understood.
> Even when it made him just occasionally, to other people, who didn't > Know him well, a little ridiculous perhaps … (150, my italics).

While Bertha’s romanticized image of Harold temporarily justifies her notion of her being in a state of bliss, it also pinpoints the problematic nature of her relationship with him. This fact is highlighted in his calling "my dear girl" (144) and earlier in the story as "Ber" (143). His words seem to be an inherent confession that she exists, as his daughter, no more than an object in his household, alienated, thus, from her real role and responsibilities (Oakley, 77-82). Watching her little B. in the nursery, Bertha contemplates: "How absurd it was, Why have a baby if it has to be kept —not in a case like a rare fiddle, rare fiddle— but in another woman's arms? ". Bertha's statement figuratively foreshadows her understanding of herself being merely a valuable object safely guarded in a protective sheath. The sheath symbolizes Harold in the image of Christ the a savior. Yet, we are made aware of the fact that "Bertha Young desired her husband desired. Oh, she'd love him --she'd been in love with him, of course, in every other way, but not just in that way " (158). In retrospect, Bertha's psychological confusion depicted in the above quoted lines is a haunting insight into the destructiveness of the values or ideologies of her bourgeois middle-class society which conceive her being only as a commodity, belonging to her husband and her husband's world and before him to her father and to her father's world. In his interesting Marxist analysis of Bertha's case, Chantal Cornut —Gentille D'arcy states that:

> just like the nurse, Bertha embodies, in Marx's own words:
> "a commodity like any other article of commerce, and consequently > { is } exposed to all the vicissitudes of competition and all the fluctuations > of the market ". Within this in mind, "Bliss "may be perceived as a > cynical exposition through Bertha, of the enforced and remarkable > status of " woman-as-commodity " within an oppressive patriarchal > system …(249).

From this perspective, Bertha's story cannot be seen as solely sentimental rendering of a transparent moment of joy in a woman's life. It is a palpable revelation of a feminist imputation engendered precisely through the negative knowledge provided by the very structures which repress and deflect her feeling of bliss (Ibid.). Instead of the idealized romantic picture which she draws of herself and her husband as a couple—being "as much in love as ever" (158), her situation climaxes into a repulsive self-deception and contradictions that she has to accommodate within her romantic perception being in heaven with Harold.

3- Bertha's Changing Perception of the Image of the Pear Tree:

The final part in the drama of a day in the life of the heroine concludes in a moment of epiphany leading to her self-realization. Mansfield's skillfully inhibits this part with rich symbols and images, each having different levels of interpretations, depending on the alternating stages of the heroine's awakening to mark figuratively the end of Bertha's delusions about herself being in a state of bliss with Harold. Of course the most important image to focus on in the discussion of this part is the pear tree. This crucial moment of realization in Bertha's life happens when she discovers Miss Fulton's flirtation with her husband. As Miss Fulton prepares to leave the party, Bertha notices that her own husband Harry rushes to help her star—like sparkling quest to put on her silver mink coat in a manner to show his secret compassion for her:

And she saw … Harry with Miss Fulton's coat in his arms and Miss Fulton with her back turned to him and her head bent. He tossed the coat away, put his hands on her shoulders and turned her violently to him. His lips said: "I adore you" and Miss Fulton laid her moonbeam fingers on his cheeks and smiled her sleepy smile (160).

Mansfield intentionally structures this transitional moment of self-discovery within a triangle form of relationships so that to highlight the three dimensions of Bertha's self-realization. And in accordance with the tree-dimensional functions of the image of the pear tree in the story. The first level of her awakening is precipitated her awareness of the unreality of the notion of her being protected by Harold's warmth and love. In this particular instance, the black cat is associated with Bertha's blindness. Hence the echoing imagery of the pear tree becomes a symbol of Harry’s deceptive reality. She is just as deceived by him as she has been alluded by the very bisexual nature of this tree. Initially, she had thought that the tree has represented herself in a state of bliss with her husband. A reality which is, yet again, depicted in the analogy she has earlier made between herself and the blooming rich, perfect and "slender pear tree" (145), standing within her walled garden. Now this walled garden becomes a metaphor for her imprisonment in self-created fantasies about her relationship with Harold.

The third and most crucial realization springs from her understanding of the true nature of the affinity between herself and her friend, Miss Fulton. The latter is associated now with the image of the deceptive grey cat, since she appears to be after the imagined stability, security and the warmth of Bertha's life with Harold. Bertha has always unknowingly sympathized with Miss Fulton and most likely shared a kind of telepathy or spiritual identification with her. She has always inwardly acknowledged that Miss Fulton to be a dreamer, like herself inclined to romanticism and sentimentalism in life. For this reason, when she has arrived to the party, dressed in white and silver colors which resemble almost the colors Bertha has chosen to wear in the party, she felt assured about her premonition of the existence of some mysterious link between them. This resemblance between the two women serves as a significant turning point in the narrative particularly when Bertha begins to conceive it a new light. Prior to the event of the party, we are told that Bertha seems unable to express in bare utterances, as in the case of her feeling bliss, the reason for liking or likening herself to Mis Fulton, whom Harold mockingly describes as a she-cat "dragging its belly" (145). She, suddenly, discovers that what they share together is the reality of conforming to a purely male-oriented patriarchal society, which is once more symbolically indicated in the associating between Harold and the pear tree. At the very end of the story Bertha painfully repeats Miss Fulton's words about her pear tree: "Your lovely pear tree -- possessing not only the garden of her own life but also the dreams of a woman like Miss Fulton, who exhausts paralyzed in transcending the boundaries designed for them in their world and are unable to shake themselves off passionately yearn for in order to ensure their everlasting happiness and fulfillment in life. For the first time Bertha begins to think that, like the solid pear tree, which is an outstanding item in her garden, Harold is possessing not only the garden of her own life but also the dreams of a woman like Miss Fulton, who exhausts all sources of femininity in order to have him. Now the dazzling Miss Fulton becomes an embodiment of an equally haunting knowledge that women, within such a social standard, waste their lives on their external looks so that they shine like dolls in the eyes of their male partners. Their prime aim in doing so is to capturing their attention and consequently to win the privileges of their protection and financial supports. This perhaps is the reason behind the extraordinary care which Mansfield takes in the delineation of Miss Fulton's outward appearances and behavior in the party. The latter's elusive attitude, noiselessness and her aloofness in the party points to her patent derives for creating a positive impact on Harry. She consciously plans to have him, since she recognizes her desperate need of him to survive within her authoritarian social system. In her turn, Miss Fulton represents the "cold mirror" (139) which Bertha deliberately avoids to look at it earlier in the story. She embodies Bertha's own inner withering and waste in caring only for the apparent superficial details of her life and her relationship with Harry. In the present situation, the pathetic Miss Fulton emerges as her counterpart in the process of women victimization by a social system. Both seem paralyzed in transcending the boundaries designed for them in their world and are unable to shake themselves off its devastating impact on them. At this point in the story, the third everlasting self-engendered peer tree emerges a symbol referring generally to all men in the Victorian society. In other words, the last pear tree represents the reality of female victimization in the Victorian society:

And the two women stood side by side looking at the slender, flowering tree. Although it was so still, it seemed, like the flame of a candle, to stretch up, to point, to quiver in the bright air, to grow taller and taller as they gaze—almost to touch the rim of the round, silver moon. How long did they stand there? Both, as it were, caught in that circle of unearthly light, understanding each other perfectly, creatures of another world, and wondering what they were to do in this one with all this blissful treasure that burned in their bosoms and dropped, in silver flowers, from their hair and hands? (155-156).

However, Mansfield uses both characters to reveal the two façades of the opposing reactions given by women to the humiliating constrains of their environment. For instance, the manner in which Miss Fulton is delineated reveals her acting as an agent for the survival and the continuum of the very social system which negates her female identity and being. She repeatedly murmurs to Bertha: "your lovely pear tree" (161;162). The repetition portrays not just her envious nature of the latter for having Harold but also undermines her innate satisfaction with the way male and female relationship is conditioned by the rigid constrains of her society. Her behavior typically foreshadows that of aunt Beryl, Isabel and other female characters in Mansfield's short story "The Doll's House", who likewise embrace the idea of the eternity of the system of conformity, in their case, to social class distinction. Bertha's character is employed to show the other side of the coin. Unlike Miss Fulton, Bertha in reality, is in conflict with her crippling world, for she suddenly realizes that Harold and herself are living totally apart from one another, because of their environment. She is as alienated from him as he from her, because they are not being themselves but playing the roles assigned to them by the society. We are told that Bertha now understands why she "only wanted to get in touch with him for a moment" (143). Henceforth, her feeling of rapture because of being married to Harry has no credible or authentic root in reality. It is as imagined and pretentious as her invented magical version of reality which she also conceives it to be her means for escaping repressing her failure and disappointment as a wife and a mother. (Gentille D'arcy, 51).

The drama of Bertha's life reaches its conclusion with the final stage of realization of the reason for her child-woman existence being "idiotic civilization" (138). Nonetheless, despite reaching the peak of self understanding she will remain eternally trapped and unable of liberating herself from being "shut up in a case like a rare, rare fiddle" (138). In the eyes of the society she is privileged to have Harold and she will surrender to this notion for the rest of her life: " For some strange reason Bertha liked this, and almost admiried it …” (144). Accordingly, Bertha’s party can be cherished as a symbol for celebrating the birth of her new conscious but incomplete self. This time she is going to blind herself deliberately to Harold’s reality. She is not going to be seduced by any illusion she has about after the party. The depiction of Bertha Young stripped of all illusion at the end of the story ascertains Mansfield’s belief in the non-existence of complete happiness in adult reality of pain and responsibilities. Ultimately, Mansfield plans for her short story Bliss to have no end (Bennett ,80 ). She intends to do no more than bringing into focus the nature of female struggle in the late Victorian era and, hence, reveal the process of their dehumanization in the system of conformity to male authority, but purely from the view points of a woman writer rather than from a male author perspectives. She declares in her story that the “trouble with our young writing men is that they are still too romantic. You can't put out to sea without being seasick and wanting a basin” (157). She hopes that the solution or the denouement for female predicaments to be delivered by her predecessor Virginia Woolf, the pioneer of feminist movement in the twentieth century. Nonetheless, the fact remains that without the image of the pear tree our access to Mansfield's viewpoints and the heroine's predicament would not have been fully achieved, within the perspectives intended in the story.

5- Conclusions:
The foregoing analysis of Mansfield’s poignant short story Bliss displays her at her best in using nature imagery, particularly the image of the pear tree, in portraying her female protagonist's predicaments from different personal, psychological and social perspectives. The image of the pear tree becomes a vital means in foreshadowing Bertha's crises both from inside, as an individual blinded by illusions, and from outside, as a victim of conforming to an authoritarian male—constructed social discourse, which reduces her life to mere nothingness and role playing. The essence of Mansfield’s narrative strategy of exquisitely blending Bertha's inner life with her outer existence is to reveal the undermining contradiction in her character as well as the fragility of the assumption of her being in a state of bliss with her husband on the very day she is going to have a party. The depiction of Bertha Young stripped of all illusion at the end of the story ascertains Mansfield's belief in the non-existence of complete happiness in adult reality of pain and responsibilities.

Notes:
5- Mansfield, Katherine. Bliss and Other Stories. Plymouth: William Brendon & Son Ltd., 1922. All quotations in the paper will be from this edition.
8- Rossetti, Christina “A Birthday” www.poetry-online.org/rossetti_christina_a_birthday.htm (Retrieved 10 October 2011)

References:
Gentille D’Arcy, Chantal Cornut – "Katherine Mansfield's 'Bliss': The Rare Fiddle as Emblem of the Political and Sexual Alienation of Woman". Paper on Language and Literature 35:no.3, 244-69, 1999.
Gregor, Keith. "Blissful Thinking: Katherine Mansfield and the Engendering of Modernist Fiction ".

Mansfield, Katherine. Bliss and Other Stories. Plymouth: William Brendon & Son Ltd, 1922. All quotations in the text will be from this edition.

This academic article was published by The International Institute for Science, Technology and Education (IISTE). The IISTE is a pioneer in the Open Access Publishing service based in the U.S. and Europe. The aim of the institute is Accelerating Global Knowledge Sharing.

More information about the publisher can be found in the IISTE’s homepage: http://www.iiste.org

CALL FOR PAPERS

The IISTE is currently hosting more than 30 peer-reviewed academic journals and collaborating with academic institutions around the world. There’s no deadline for submission. Prospective authors of IISTE journals can find the submission instruction on the following page: http://www.iiste.org/Journals/

The IISTE editorial team promises to the review and publish all the qualified submissions in a fast manner. All the journals articles are available online to the readers all over the world without financial, legal, or technical barriers other than those inseparable from gaining access to the internet itself. Printed version of the journals is also available upon request of readers and authors.

IISTE Knowledge Sharing Partners

EBSCO, Index Copernicus, Ulrich's Periodicals Directory, JournalTOCS, PKP Open Archives Harvester, Bielefeld Academic Search Engine, Elektronische Zeitschriftenbibliothek EZB, Open J-Gate, OCLC WorldCat, Universe Digital Library, NewJour, Google Scholar